The Weekly Intelligencer,

may appear at the date of the death of my one of us are the profits of the conjugal society.

This is a rather unusual recognition of the business co-partnership which exists between man and wife. It is not every man that in withing to admit that the savings and the gains of his life are "the profits of the conjugal society," jointly carned by both and their joint property. Yet if the twain be indeed one flesh, this is the right view, though the duband may in fact have carned every dellar of the fortune, as doubtless Don Temss Terry did.

A From the hour when a man and a wiman are joined in wedleck they ought not to consider that they can have my separate interest. If the wife does not go into the world and esin, she'sperious her part by the orderly management of her household, by resting her children, by using to the best of adventage as much of the esrnings of her husband as cames into her hands, by making a house a home.

We know nothing of the home life of Don Tomss Terry, but it must have been a happy one. The clause quoted from the will shows his affectionate regard for his wife, shows him to have recaping and the responsibility; and it is upon this responsibility; and the large for his wife, shows him to have recaping the characters. If the will shows his affectionate regard for his wife, shows him to have rewe know nating of the home has been a happy one. The clause quoted from the will shows his affectionate regard for his wife, shows him to havo recognized the equality of the co-partnorship and stamps him as a man of a high sense of honor and justice. It appears also that he had for a wife a woman whom he thought worthy to be his partner. Therefore we have a right to suppose the Terry household was a happy one.

There is a useful suggestion in the last will and testament of this wealthy Cuban. It teaches the lesson of the equality of husband and wife and their indiscoluble community of interest. It is much better than the barbarous dectrine that the husband is lord ever the wife, who subsists upon his bounty.

"You know the time-honored joke about my family?" my friend saked, looking up with a droll smile. "They say that we never go to bed and never get up,"

"Yee," I answered, "but the world will never accept the fact that there are two classees of people—those who are at their work and then run down like clocks—and then they awake early in the morning and then run down like clocks—and then who are at their work and weakest and dullest when sleep is just over, but who are gradually winding themselves up all day, so that when evening comes they are equal to saything. The trouble is that the morning people are such a misjor-watch and the run and come is the run between the provision and parlors. For I have found that if one wate a happy home one unstant hunger the provision and the run was a like the subject of the fact that there are two closes of people—those who are at their work in t

There is an egotiam in the title of this article implying that one has really learned housekeeping, which one who feels herself an imperfect housekeeper is loth to display. Yet being asked the question, it seems a little matter to answer it. Thus I will say in the beginning that I rever did learn housekeeping; for as far as I have gone in its art and science I have always found before me something yet unlearned.

T suppose I might date my first afforts To Err la Human, yet unlearned.

So Saving That He Picked Up a Pin.

ochland (Me.) Courter. One fine day a For gglesville man cam One fine day a Forigalesville man came to town with a pailful of clams, which he sold. Then, washing out the pail carefully, he had a gallon of molasses noured into it and started for home. Feeling the weight of his burden he put a stick through the pail and hung the pail over his shoulder. Freezenty, joggleg along in an abstracted manner, the Scrigglesville man espied a pin in the road, and being of a frigant turn he attooped over to pick it up. This seamed to the molasses to be us good a chance as it could find, and it promptly stepped out of the pail and walked all over the back of the Scrigglesville man, as he struggled to his feet and viewed the devastation wrought upon the scenery, "a gallon of molasses for a pin." This tessues us never to throw away a certainty for an uncertainty. Special Botices.
